

HealthStream Announces Collaboration with the American Red Cross to Improve Resuscitation Outcomes

December 4, 2018

In January 2019, the American Red Cross will launch its new resuscitation suite with HealthStream

NASHVILLE, Tenn.--(BUSINESS WIRE)--Dec. 4, 2018-- HealthStream (NASDAQ: HSTM), a leading provider of workforce and provider solutions for the healthcare industry, today announced a new, long-term agreement with the American Red Cross. HealthStream and the Red Cross will work together to improve resuscitation outcomes.

As a part of the collaborative relationship, HealthStream has participated as an inaugural member of the American Red Cross multi-disciplinary-based "Innovation Council on Resuscitation," which holds its next meeting on January 16, 2019 in Washington D.C. Immediately following this meeting, the Red Cross will launch its new resuscitation suite with HealthStream.

"According to JAMA Cardiology, the median survival rate after in-hospital cardiac arrests is 23.8%, with a wide variance among hospitals," said David Markenson, MD, Chair of the Red Cross Scientific Advisory Council, First Aid Task Force member of the International Liaison Committee on Resuscitation (ILCOR), and Medical Director at the New York Medical College Center for Disaster Medicine. "We believe the survival rates should be higher—across all of the nation's hospitals and health systems. To that end, we are collaborating with industry, including HealthStream, who shares our vision to improve the quality of healthcare and save lives."

"The American Red Cross has a long history of making robust contributions to the global science of resuscitation," said Robert A. Frist, Jr., Chief Executive Officer, HealthStream. "Like the American Red Cross, we are committed to professional development in healthcare—as we are confident that, together, we can improve resuscitation outcomes."
